STEP 1

Cart Reminder+ Scarcity Email

Timing: 30 minutes to 24 hours after cart abandonment

- Around 69% of customers tend to forget their items in carts. So, as a responsible brand, it is important to give them a friendly reminder first. It should sound casual and not very pushy.
- Remind them again what they are missing out to create a FOMO. It works most of the time.
- Adding fun elements and making references to popular movies or books can create a friendly connection with your consumer. It also displays the brand personality pretty well.
- Relatable pictures are always a nice addition to make the email look more interesting. They also do a great job of catching the attention of the recipient.

STEP 2

Trust + Education Email

Timing: 2 days after the cart abandonment

- It is necessary to have a gap between the first and second emails. Remember, the emails should not sound pushy.
- The second email should be able to build trust between the brand and the consumers. So, it is important to include some trust factors. Providing important information about the product as well as the brand will both educate the consumer and gain their trust.
- Keep the structure short and crisp.
- Pictures and fun elements should be there to give to make the mail sound friendly and fun.

STEP 3

Final value Proposition Email

Timing: 4-7 days after the cart abandonment

- This is the last mail to bring back the abandoned cart. It is important to create a sense of urgency at this stage.
- This is the mail where the final discount should be offered. And it should be put in a way to make the customer feel special.
- In the end, a powerful CTA should be included as usual.
- It is also necessary to carry on the fun elements that were in the previous emails to keep the consistency.
- Creating a sense of urgency without sounding pushy is the main idea of this final step.
